PRIVILEGED INSTRUCTIONS

Ministry of Foreign Affairs
PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China

Privileged Instructions

Fundamental Principle

- Establish peace and stability on the Korean Peninsula through multilateral dialogue.

Desired End States

- A denuclearized North Korean state.
- Military reductions to levels commensurate with normal national defense needs.
- A secure and prosperous North Korean state at peace with the world.
- Recognition of the DPRK's rightful and proper place as an independent nation.
- A process for the negotiation of a peace treaty between the U.S., ROK and DPRK.

Principle Negotiation Positions

- Continuous engagement and dialogue are the paths forward! There is no viable alternative.
- A modification to the tenets of the 2005 Joint Resolution are the foundation for further negotiations; however, this is not a sacrosanct position. The recent changes in the relationships between the DPRK, ROK and the United States may force a relook t the fundamental negotiation precepts going forward.
- All parties must negotiate in good faith and ensure that any compromises or change in positions are fully supported by their home governments.
- While engaged in these negotiations, a "mutual freeze" must be reinstated, in which:
 - Pyongyang ceases all missile and nuclear weapons development and testing
 - The United States and South Korea suspends all military exercises
- The United States should agree to remove THAAD from South Korea to promote a sign of good faith.
- All delegations should agree to support the people of North Korea by providing immediate humanitarian assistance once Pyongyang has agreed and implemented a verified and internationally monitored suspension of its nuclear weapons and ballistic missile programs.
- All participating delegations must recognize the DPRK's rights as an independent nation and act responsibly in accordance with to the tenets of the UN Charter.
- Immediate removal of all U.S. sanctions on international financial institutions targeting North Korea.

- All nations should respect the DPRK's right to possess a civilian nuclear power program.
- At an appropriate time, Pyongyang, Seoul and Washington should look to start separate negotiations on a peace treaty to formally end the Korean War.

Red Flags

- Intransigence by any of the parties involved in these negotiations.
- Discussion of topics not germane to the issues codified in the Chairman's Framework (Does not apply to new issues once accepted by all parties.)
- Any attempt to deny the DPRK rights afforded to all nations, to include the right to a civilian nuclear capability.

Delegation Instructions

Ensure periodic reports, requests for further guidance, or clarifications to the instructions herein are submitted via message to the office of the Foreign Minister.

1. Chairmanship: Through the mutual agreement of all parties, we will act as the chair of these talks. In that role we will set the agenda through mutual agreement; our Foreign Minister will chair the opening and closing plenary sessions. The Head of Delegation will chair any meetings that we call with all six parties.

2. Our Positions: Continuous dialogue is the sole path forward; therefore, we cannot let these talks break down or fail. Every effort must be made to ensure continued engagement between the parties, either through bilateral or multilateral talks.

The first step and primary order of business at the start of these talks must be a negotiated agreement between Washington, Seoul and Pyongyang for the immediate return to the "mutual freeze" that was in place in 2018. It is only through that agreement can talks proceed with any expectation of progress and success.

Overall, our nation seeks a stable Korean Peninsula, and a stable, prosperous, and responsible North Korean nation that works in harmony with the world. We do not believe that the DPRK requires, or should be in possession of, nuclear weapons or offensive ballistic missile capabilities. We also do not believe that Pyongyang intends to employ nuclear weapons against any nation, to include the United States, as that would lead to its destruction. Therefore, any perceived threat to South Korea, Japan, or the United States is overstated. Eventual peace, in the form of a formal resolution of the Korean War, between our nation, North Korea, South Korea, and the United States, would go a long way towards creating a permanent de-escalation of tensions in the region.

3. Negotiations with North Korea: In your talks with the representatives from Pyongyang, ensure they understand that we seek the preservation of, and prosperity for, their nation. We believe the sŏn'gun state ideology and the pyŏngjin line are counterproductive and only serve the military sector while leaving the civilian sector increasingly impoverished. While Kim had declared an end to these philosophies, prioritizing economic rebuilding, we are not sure that the past year has not seen a reemergence of the sŏn'gun ideology and the pyŏngjin line. We believe that they have the right to possess a civilian nuclear power program, but that the production and possession of nuclear weapons and long-range ballistic missiles is unwise and unnecessary. While we support the DPRK's possession of a civilian nuclear capability, it must be solely to produce electricity and nothing else. Advise the North Korean negotiators that they must put the needs of their people first. They should also understand that while we will work to assist them in their dealings with Washington, Seoul, and Tokyo we will only do so if they negotiate in good faith and adhere to the agreements they enter. They should also understand that, while we will press all parties to ease their sanctions and to seek normalized relations, we will have little tolerance for any misbehavior on their part.

4. Negotiations with South Korea: We share its desire to see the denuclearization of the peninsula, in terms of nuclear weapons and ballistic missile systems. They should understand that we support the North's right to possess and operate a civilian nuclear power capability, as they have in their own nation. In return for Pyongyang's permanent shutdown and disablement of its current nuclear and long-range ballistic missile capabilities, we favor a return to the installation of light water reactors for power generation in the North. Under a revived Korean Energy Development Organization (KEDO), we would require the immediate removal of the U.S. THAAD systems from Korea. In working with South Korea, we also favor and will assist in:

- a. Working toward the negotiation, and signing, of a peace accord ending the Korean War
- b. The South's recognition of North Korea as a separate Korean nation
- c. Replacement of the DMZ with an internationally recognized border with normal cross-border processes and movements between both nations
- d. The commensurate reduction of military forces on both sides to peacetime levels
- e. The eventual withdrawal/re-stationing of all U.S. forces from the peninsula.

While we understand the desire to reunify the peninsula to a single Korean nation, we caution that such an undertaking can only be pursued in the longer term. Only with the expressed desire of both the North and the South, under a mutually determined system of government. Significant aid would be required to not create an overbearing burden on the government and economic structure. There are no guarantees on how much aid might be promised, or delivered, to alleviate such a burden. The better option would be to continue to recognize the DPRK as a separate nation, and to build up that nation, its people, and its institutions over the long-term. Only after this long-term goal is accomplished should there be talk of possible unification.

5. Negotiations with Japan: As with South Korea and the United States, we understand that the Japanese feel threatened by the DPRK's nuclear and missile programs. While we do not see these programs as actual threats that would be carried out by Pyongyang. We will seek to persuade the DPRK to end these programs. We would like to get Tokyo's agreement to the resumption of the KEDO emplacement of LWRs in North Korea, and its part in financing the operation. Request that it help persuade the South Korean and American delegations of the wisdom of this course of action. We would also like Tokyo's support for an immediate return to a "mutual freeze" to provide breathing space for these talks to operate under. With the DPRK's admitted kidnapping of Japanese citizens in the 1970s and '80s, we sympathize with their plight, but these talks are not the proper forum for a discussion of this issue. Encourage the Japanese delegation to either set this discrete issue aside for separate bilateral talks with the DPRK, outside the Six-Party Talks, or failing that, request that it conduct bilateral talks with the North as an aside to these talks, perhaps facilitated by members of our delegation.

6. Negotiations with Russia: In past talks, the Russian delegation has been supportive of our positions as we have tried to push back against the united front put forward by the United States, Japan and South Korea. We assume the Russians remain supportive, but their positions must be gauged to ensure we are operating along the same lines. It seems clear that Moscow seeks to become a major influence in northeast Asia. It seeks to increase its influence on the Korean peninsula at the expense of the Americans. We expect the Russian delegation to support our call for an immediate return to a "mutual freeze" position. Thereafter also advocating for a civilian nuclear program for the DPRK, as well as immediate humanitarian assistance for North Korea, and the normalization of the North's relations with the rest of the world. Normalization, and aligning our points of view, could form a solution that would advance Moscow's economic interests in this part of the world.

7. Negotiations with the United States: It must be clear to Washington that the DPRK will not give up its nuclear weapons and missile programs to appease them. As the North Koreans have demonstrated in the past, they will do just the opposite. It seems clear that Washington will not accept or is unwilling to acknowledge that Kim Jong-un wishes to enter a relationship of mutual respect with the United States. The North's nuclear and longer-range missile programs seemed to be the only way to attain the attention and direct engagement of the United States. Therefore, part of the reason for the present crisis lies with Washington. It is imperative that the U.S. Administration move in a decisive manner to acknowledge the need for a permanent relationship with North Korea before the DPRK delegation can be expected to begin to negotiate in earnest. The United States dramatically increased sanctions on world financial systems and organizations to deny the North any financial or economic movement, which is having the greatest impact on the poorest sectors of society. This has caused an ad hoc, cash-only, black market to provide foodstuffs at the lowest level to help assuage malnutrition and starvation. For the DPRK to give up its military nuclear program, we must convince the Americans to agree to offer the DPRK the re-establishment of the KEDO and the emplacement of LWRs. Prior to any of that, Washington, along with Pyongyang must accept the re-imposition of a "mutual freeze" as a necessary first step starting the negotiation process. If the United States and South Korea are serious about advancing these negotiations, they must make a move that would encourage a confidence-building process and force the hand of the DPRK to respond in kind, and immediately stabilize the situation. The freeze must be the first move in a step-by-step process that would first reduce tensions and then move us to a negotiation process based on the 2005 Joint Resolution. While nonproliferation is a valid concern, it is not a primary issue for consideration at this time and should be left to a much later stage of an established step-by-step process.
