PRIVILEGED INSTRUCTIONS

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation

Privileged Instructions

Fundamental Principles

- Establishment of peace and stability on the Korean Peninsula.
- As a neighboring state to both China and North Korea, we will establish primary influence in and have significant leverage over both the ongoing situation and the future of the region.

Desired End States

- Eventual denuclearization of North Korea.
- The North Korean military should, over time, be reduced to levels commensurate with normal, non-nuclear, self-defense.
- A North Korean state generally in compliance with international norms.
- A North Korean State that can be trusted to adhere to both the spirit and substance of all agreements entered.
- The establishment of peace agreement between the United States, South Korea and North Korea to end the Korean War.
- A DPRK at peace with South Korea and the rest of the world that is open to external sources of economic development and assistance.

Principle Negotiation Positions

- Throughout this process we will maintain good relations with Pyongyang, as our primary long-term interests are to increase our overall influence on the Korean peninsula primarily through economic and infrastructure investments.
- Diplomacy is the only method to address the DPRK on the full range of issues and the six-party talks are the optimal forum.
- We advocate for a step-by-step series of agreements ending with the elimination of the North's nuclear weapons program. Such a progressive series of steps will allow for confidence-building and trust issues to be adequately and effectively addressed and developed as talks move forward at a deliberate pace and these smaller agreements get put into place.
- We do have concerns about continued proliferation by North Korea. However, that issue can be addressed as one of the final measures in the step-by-step series of agreements.
- We do believe that North Korea has the right to a civilian nuclear program, but any remaining nuclear activities or programs must be for peaceful purposes only and must fall under strict IAEA monitoring and inspection regimes.

NOTIONAL EXERCISE MATERIAL FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES ONLY

- The DPRK must rejoin and become a member in good standing of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).
- We support a return to the Korean Energy Development Organization (KEDO) and the establishment of Light Water Nuclear Reactors for the sole provision of electrical power.
- The U.S., ROK, and Japanese concerns of a return to conflict and the North's use of nuclear weapons is over-exaggerated and nothing more than a ploy designed to extract concessions.
- We have not, and will not, recognize North Korea as a nuclear state. We will work to convince it that its need for nuclear weapon and ballistic missile programs is counterproductive, economically burdensome, and highly detrimental to its nation's development.
- U.S. THAAD deployments in South Korea and the entire U.S. Missile Defense Program is an absurd overreach against a low risk North Korean nuclear and military threat. The THAAD deployment to South Korea has only served to ratchet up tensions. It should be immediately shuttered, then removed from the peninsula as soon as possible.
- While engaged in these negotiations, we concur with the Chinese position that the following simultaneous actions should occur:
 - The DPRK ceases all nuclear weapons development and testing.
 - The United States, South Korea, and Japan cease all military exercises.
- Immediate reductions in U.S. sanctions on international financial institutions regarding North Korea to induce concessions from Pyongyang.
- Begin immediate provision of supervised humanitarian assistance through local North Korean government entities to meet essential nutrition and health needs.
- As soon as possible, Pyongyang, Seoul, and Washington should move aggressively to start separate negotiations on a peace treaty to end the Korean War.

Red Flags

- Any movement toward a comprehensive agreement over a step-by-step agreement.
- Any steps taken to sideline our delegation or to reduce our role in these talks

Delegation Instructions

Ensure periodic reports, requests for further guidance, or clarifications to the instructions herein are submitted via message to the office of the Foreign Minister.

Beijing and Moscow agree that the Six-Party Talks is the optimal forum for dealing with this situation, and that continued engagement within this diplomatic structure is the only acceptable method to work toward solutions. Work in tandem with the Chinese delegation to maintain our position that a series of smaller, more readily attainable, step-by-step agreements is the most practicable way forward to bring a final, sustainable resolution to this crisis.

We seek a stable and peaceful Korean peninsula to increase our influence in the region in direct competition with China, Japan, South Korea, and the United States. This requires a stable and responsible North Korean regime open to economic integration with the world.

With regards the current situation, we believe that the mutual deterrence currently in place will maintain the status quo, and that the actual risk of war is quite remote. We hold that the U.S. THAAD deployment is not only an unjustified overreach, but also a contributing cause of the current increased tensions in the region, and therefore the system must be withdrawn from the peninsula as soon as possible.

We do not believe that the DPRK requires, or should be in possession of, a nuclear weapons or offensive ballistic missile capabilities programs. To that end, we will work with the other parties to ensure that this capability is terminated in a peaceful manner through a series of separate but integrated agreements.

We agree with the Chinese proposal for the immediate re-establishment of the "mutual freeze" – the DPRK's missile and nuclear program and joint U.S.-ROK exercises. This is to reduce tensions and create an atmosphere conducive to constructive dialogue. The issue to be resolved is how a freeze of the North's nuclear program would be monitored to ensure compliance during the existence and duration of any freeze. This will require the DPRK to readmit IAEA inspectors with unfettered access to all nuclear sites, which may be difficult to accomplish. As part of the step-by-step process, we would argue the need to offer immediate humanitarian aid in exchange for Pyongyang's acceptance of IAEA monitoring. However, the most productive option, and probably the one that would likely to create a positive response from Pyongyang, would be the immediate lessening of U.S. sanctions across the board, but especially the most recent ones that target financial institutions. Assuming Pyongyang accepts IAEA monitoring, and such monitoring is established and proceeds according to IAEA requirements, then we would encourage a readdress of the full range of UN sanctions placed against the DPRK at an appropriate point in time.

In time, the North's nuclear weapons program will be disabled and terminated, any additional address of nonproliferation concerns should be tabled until much later in this process in order not to bog down the ongoing talks with issues that the North might not be willing to address.

In order to entice Pyongyang to divest itself of its nuclear weapons and ballistic missile programs, we would support the provision of Light Water Power Reactors to North Korea within the tenets of the step-by-step agreement and done through the reestablishment of the Korean Energy Development Organization (KEDO). However, we also favor the development of more conventional, non-nuclear, electrical energy production processes along with upgrades to the North's antiquated power grid. This could best be done through commercial contracts with commercial entities in both our nation and China.

North Korea must cease any, and all, provocative acts. These acts are used to sabotage and destroy confidence-building efforts that are essential to these talks by not allowing them to continue and progress. Use leverage of tying humanitarian relief to the behavior of the North's military. No relief can be expected if military provocations occur as they have in the past. This also goes to ability to build trust between all parties, which is essential to making, and retaining, any substantive progress in these talks. Once agreements have been reached, there can be no backtracking.

With regards confidence-building, we should propose that delegates from Seoul and Pyongyang resume their once promising North-South dialogue, either within these talks or separately, without preconditions. This will rebuild trust between the two nations, and by extension within the region, internationally, and especially within these talks. We would encourage that those bilateral talks focus on the bigger picture issue of an actual peace agreement to formally end the Korean War. Of course, to accomplish a peace agreement at some point the United States must enter as a partner to this effort. But resolving the war through a three-party peace agreement will go a long way in helping to create the conditions needed to resolve the nuclear issue and pave the way for extensive and generous humanitarian relief. The North Korean people desperately need such relief and to be welcomed as an equal among nations. In so doing it will finally establish a Korean peninsula with peace and prosperity.

Lastly, our relationship with Kim's father was as a respected honest broker. We were the one nation he could trust when he felt he could not trust China, let alone the United States, South Korea, or certainly Japan. His father sought our advice during and after the October 2006 nuclear test that nearly ended the six-party talks then. We helped keep the lines of communication and dialogue open that allowed the talks to resume the next year. We must now understand how his son regards our nation and its role in these negotiations. If they offer no position, then offer that we would be happy to remain an honest broker, positioned between all parties in order that we may be of assistance to all parties. However, especially to the North Koreans so that we can see peace in the region, and the attendant economic growth that would benefit both our nations. To be an honest broker, we must be respected by all participants as a full partner in these negotiations. Any attempts by the other delegations to sideline our delegation and its efforts will only hurt the overall process that must be completed to ensure a sound and durable peace as soon as possible.
